Behind The Bloodshed by USA Today

In 2012, USA TODAY set out to find how common mass killings were in America. What we found is they are far more common than people thought, many do not involve a gun and most involve some kind of 'innocent bystander.' Perhaps more importantly: the FBI's data is wrong about the nation's most brutal crimes nearly half of the time.

The Counted by The Guardian

The Counted works to count the number of people killed by police and other law enforcement agencies in the United States throughout 2015 and 2016, to monitor their demographics and to tell the stories of how they died.

170 people shot dead by police this year

990 people were fatally shot by police in 2015

At least 86 people have been shot and killed by police across the United States within the past 30 days, according to Washington Post data. This database is based on news reports, public records, Internet databases and original reporting. Read more.

Police Shootings by The Washington Post

In 2015, The Washington Post chronicled every on-duty police shooting by an officer in the U.S. The effort continues in 2016.

The Next To Die by The Marshall Project

Looking back, we know quite a bit about who has been executed in America. Looking ahead, however, we know very little about who is to be executed and how their cases move through the system. This project shines a light on these cases and the death penalty in action nationwide.

INTRODUCTION

By Gabriel Dance, The Marshall Project

Looking back, we know quite a bit about who has been put to death in the United States. We know that the last person to be executed was Brian Keith Terrell, who died 28 days ago by lethal injection in Georgia. We have records that show he was the 1,422nd person to have been executed since 1976. In fact, since executions resumed that year following a four-year suspension imposed by the Supreme Court, we know many specifics including race, age, sex and other information about those who have paid the ultimate price in the criminal justice system.

But there has been no detailed, up-to-date schedule of coming executions.
